

Jing Wei

Illustrator

Interview by Tina Essmaker

July 11, 2017

Photography by Julia Hembree

Brooklyn-based illustrator, Jing Wei, has been drawing her whole life and found her way into illustration during her college years, after which she moved to New York to forge a career. Here she reflects on her experience of immigrating to the US as a child, how the support of her parents influenced her trajectory, the struggle to find her style—and why she avoided drawing people for so long—and why she’s playing the long game versus seeking out short-term notoriety and fame.

Tell me about where you grew up and how it influenced your childhood.

I was born in China and lived there for the first seven years of my life. In 1993, we immigrated to the States. My dad came first to set up a foundation and my mom followed with me a couple years later. Then we started our life in America.

I guess I always drew, but all kids grow up drawing so I didn't think there was anything special about it. When I moved to the US, I felt a complete loss of identity and culture. I didn't have anything to grab onto. I felt behind and I tried to catch up by learning the language and learning what American kids liked and did. Drawing was the thing that was consistent the entire time. It was a way to connect with people and keep myself happy and entertained. That's when it started to click for me.

Fast forward to high school. I was a decent student, but I never gravitated toward any topic as passionately as I did drawing.

“The most important thing is to be confident in your worth and not undersell yourself or underestimate your value.”

When it came time for college, it made sense for me to apply to art school, so I put all my eggs in one basket and only applied to art schools.

Then my dad and I did a tour of a few of the schools across the country, which is still one of my favorite trips that we've taken together.

When he and I went to the East Coast, I fell in love with Rhode Island School of Design (RISD). It also worked out because RISD is a well-known school. My parents thought that if I was going to do this, I should be doing it at the best school and giving it 110%. So I went to RISD and after graduation I moved to New York where I fell into a really amazing community of people.

I don't have a common story for immigrant children. My parents didn't put pressure on me. They let me discover what I like, which Does anyone in your family do creative work for a living?

Nobody in the entirety of my family history has pursued a creative career. Nobody knows where this comes from. My mom is a computer engineer and my dad is a biochemist.

I read that you have a background in printmaking. Did you study that at RISD?

I got a BFA in illustration. It was kind of broad because I was brought up on technical training, so I wasn't too conceptual with my work until the end of my time in college. I didn't discover printmaking until junior or senior year. At the time, I was grasping for a technique to help boost my ideas because I was having trouble taking things from start to finish. Printmaking was this me-

Did you know that you wanted to move to New York after college?

Yeah, it seemed like the logical next step because I wasn't going to move back to California and everything I was interested in was in New York. I wanted to go freelance and I didn't exactly know how I was going to do that, but I met so many talented and inspiring people at RISD, which is a huge part of going to a college like that. Yeah, it seemed like the logical next step because I wasn't going to move back to California and everything I was interested in was in New York.

I wanted to go freelance and I didn't exactly know how I was going to do that, but I met so many talented and inspiring people at RISD, which is a huge part of going to a college like that.

You build a community that stays with you throughout your career. So I moved to New York in 2008 with a bunch of friends and we shared this crazy loft in Bushwick back when it was more affordable. (laughing) Our bedrooms didn't even have walls, which you're down for when you're 22. We were somewhat living that artist's dream that we had envisioned for ourselves.

Tell me about the first few years out of college when you were freelancing.

I want to know how you got clients, what the biggest financial challenges were, and if you were you doing other work to pay the bills while building your practice? Everyone has their own path and I see some people who are superstars right out of the gate, but I was not one of those people.

I am a practical person and I struggled to be confident in my work right out of school. I got to New York and didn't want to burn through my savings in the first six months so I knew I had to get a job to support myself. Once you move to New York, it's like this timer is set off and there's a sense of urgency to create stability for yourself.

I had an internship working on an Adult Swim pilot. That taught me how to work with other people, how crazy people can be in New York, and how little they can care about you as a person. I was just a set of hands. After that I got a steady part-time job teaching Mandarin to babies on the Upper West Side, which was fun, but very bizarre.

“When I moved to the US, I felt a complete loss of identity and culture. I didn’t have anything to grab onto... Drawing was the thing that was consistent the entire time. It was a way to connect with people and keep myself happy and entertained.”

When were you able to focus on illustration full-time?

Graduating in 2008 was not the best timing. That was scary. At the time, there weren't too many in-house positions available. You could freelance, work in publishing, become an art director, or teach. There weren't that many paths, or at least it didn't seem like it at the time.

I actually got my first job when I was a senior in college. I had taken a class taught by Chris Buzelli, who was really good at helping students develop their voice through editorial assignments. His wife, SooJin, art directs a suite of financial magazines, and she hired me for a cover right before graduation. That was a huge boost. I was on cloud nine. I had a chunk of money that I thought was so much money. And then there was a lull after college, and I had to experience feeling lost for a bit, before finding focus

But I don't think there was one singular job that made me feel like, oh my god, I made it. It was a lot of different things coming together at once. At some point, I realized that it was actually feasible to fully support myself through illustration, and that was a really awesome feeling.

One thing that did play into it was getting a studio. Around 2010, I decided to invest in a space and put down the money and take it more seriously. With that mentality, something shifted. I had the space and felt like a business. I went to work every day for consistent hours. The rest of it came along with that.

Let's talk about your style because people starting out are thinking about finding their unique perspective, and you have that, especially in the way you draw people. Was that a conscious evolution or was it a struggle?

I think that's always been a tricky thing for me. It's interesting to hear from other people that I have a very distinct style because sometimes I feel like it's still all over the place. When you're starting out, there can be pressure to make your work look cohesive. And that can sometimes cause you to make drawing or design decisions that are forced, purely for the sake of consistency. I've found that the more I got away from that thinking, the more my style has strengthened.

It's funny that you mention the way I draw people, because I avoided drawing people for a solid two years in the beginning. For some reason, it was really intimidating to me, probably because there are literally a million ways to draw a person.

So I basically drew animals for every assignment, which got old quickly. At some point I realized that I never wanted to draw another armadillo again, so I finally started to explore how I wanted to depict people. Now it's one of my favorite things to draw.

My style has also naturally evolved through embracing various mediums. I used to do a lot of printmaking with block prints, so I made drawings that catered to the process. I didn't work digitally until three or four years out of college. It's still a fairly recent thing for me, but when I learned it, I really embraced it. That gave my work a completely different look and feel.

I do have this underlying world I'm building at all times that I incorporate into assignments, but I also look to the prompts from jobs to dictate content. That guides me along to try different things and figure out what I like. That's why I like freelance illustration—the turnarounds are so fast that you can try it and move on. If it works, keep it. Otherwise, you can discard it and it's not a total loss. That helps me progress. Sometimes I surprise myself.

---

“...I want to find more time for experimentation. Once you get in the cycle of doing job after job, you lose that sense of play. I want to stretch myself. In order to do that I need to stop, make time, and take risks to do things I haven't done before.”

---

It sounds like your style has developed through a combination of experimenting and making a lot of work over time.

Totally. Effort and experimentation is a lot of it. At this point in my career, I want to find more time for experimentation. Once you get in the cycle of doing job after job, you lose that sense of play. I want to stretch myself. In order to do that I need to stop, make time, and take risks to do things I haven't done before.

Do you feel a responsibility to contribute to something outside of yourself. You mentioned that you teach—is that a way you choose to give back?

Definitely. I never thought that I would go into teaching. The opportunity fell into my lap. A couple of my friends were co-teaching this publications class at Pratt and they emailed me out of the blue and said they couldn't do it anymore. They asked if I would take it over. The class was right up my alley and I ended up lov-

to the table. It feels more like a collaboration, like I'm working together with them.

But, yes, there's an overarching feeling of social responsibility that I think we all have as people, especially right now. In terms of creative work, I do want to give back as much as I can. I see teaching as one way to do that. I try to meet with people who want to chat and ask me for advice. I also recently started mentoring a high school student. There's this cool program called Built By Girls, which empowers high school women who are interested in art and tech. I meet with this girl once a month to chat with her and help her figure out what it is that she wants to do.

Do you feel a responsibility to contribute to something outside of yourself. You mentioned that you teach—is that a way you choose to give back?

Definitely. I never thought that I would go into teaching. The opportunity fell into my lap. A couple of my friends were co-teaching this publications class at Pratt and they emailed me out of the blue and said they couldn't do it anymore. They asked if I would take it over. The class was right up my alley and I ended up loving it. Pratt kids are so hardworking and they bring a lot to the table. It feels more like a collaboration, like I'm working together with them.

But, yes, there's an overarching feeling of social responsibility that I think we all have as people, especially right now. In terms of creative work, I do want to give back as much as I can. I see teaching as one way to do that. I try to meet with people who want to chat and ask me for advice. I also recently started mentoring a high school student. There's this cool program called Built By Girls, which empowers high school women who are interested in art and tech. I meet with this girl once a month to chat with her and help her figure out what it is that she wants to do.

That sounds amazing. What have you learned through teaching that you haven't learned through client work?

Students are so smart. I feel like young people are underestimated, but they are right there with me in critique and conversation. As a freelancer, you can often work in a silo. You're making the work and your hands and mind are busy. You hardly sit down and look at your body of work and assess why you're doing it. Teaching raises these bigger questions about what we're doing and why we're doing it, about why something works and another thing doesn't. Being mindful of that on a regular basis is good. In the end, my students are giving me a perspective that I don't get from my peers and coworkers. And they definitely expose me to a lot of memes, so I feel like I'm staying hip. They give me shit if there's something I don't know, which I like because it means I'm not so old that they've given up on me. (laughing)

“Teaching raises these bigger questions about what we’re doing and why we’re doing it, about why something works and another thing doesn’t. Being mindful of that on a regular basis is good.”

Do you feel creatively satisfied with the work you get to do and how you split your time?

I have consistent moments of creative satisfaction, which I think is pretty much the best you can hope for. I'm making work I'm happy with, but at the same time, I still see a lot of potential in myself. I'm excited to explore that.

It's nice to have different pieces to your practice.

Yeah, and the grass is always greener. People who are in-house want to freelance. People who freelance are always terrified that work won't be steady. I feel like that experience satisfied both worlds. As a freelancer, it's not always glamorous. You have to take on shit jobs to pay the rent sometimes. Having the set income with Etsy allowed me to be more picky about the projects I took on. And having that time and breathing room for my work was invaluable. It was a great experience.

